If you have already a huge collection of MP3 audio files and have been created at 256kbps or more, keep them. But what does this have to do with mp3, could you ask me? As a format people will use codec aac (advanced audio coding). In this way he creates a larger file of the same quality as the AP3. Are all mp3 the same? Most MP3s are created with a 44.1 kHz sampling rate - especially when converting from the CD because it is the same sampling rate used for the creation of Audio CD. The difference between these two is enormous - at 8kbps, your music sounds a little better than a Radio AM with scarce reception. Bitrate, on the other hand, can be set everywhere from 8kbps to 320kbps. The downside of these online converters is that the speed Usually very slowly compared to the software on your computer. However, today it would be rare to find a digital music player who cannot manage all MP3 bitTates - also VBR (or variable bitrate) that use different rates during the different parts of the musical track as a complex of the sound increases or decreases. At that time, it was overcome by other file formats, one of which is MP4. But these are conventions, not rules, the only real way to find out is trying to open the file using a multimedia reader compatible with MP4 or examine the content of the file. Although it is not the only file format, the term MP3 has become synonymous with digital music in the same way in which Google has with a web research - not surprising, since the file format has now more than 20 years. There are many videos with which audio alone would not tell the whole story, but in cases where audio could be precious on its own, you can use MP3 files to store only audio. Most experts would support that an AAC coded MP4 audio file sounds better than a similar one Mp3. The same is not true on the contrary: once an MP3 has been created (and parts of the original audio information discarded in the compression process), it is not possible to recover it by converting it to MP4/Alac. So what should I use? The fact that some of these programs perform the internal memory of the computer and are not based on the internet connection means that the files can convert more quickly. 128kbps was preferred in the first days of the MP3 format because it was compatible with most of the MP3 playback devices such as iPod, iPod.
