Aster aweke new song 2019 chewa

Aster Aweke (Amharic: ለስቴር ሳዊቅ; born 1959) is an Ethiopian singer. She is known for her 1999 album Hagere, and her 2008 album Fikir. She left to live in the United States in 1981, and she first came back to home-county Ethiopia in 1997[1][2]. This article is about a person whose name ends in a patronymic rather than a family name. The article properly refers to the person by her given name, Aster, and not as Aweke. Aster was born in 1959 in Asela, Ethiopia. She was raised in the capital city of Addis Ababa. Her father was a senior civil servant in the Imperial government of Haile Selassie.[2] By 1981, Aster had become disillusioned by Derg's oppressive political climate and relocated to the United States. She first settled in California to pursue education, but later relocated to Washington, D.C. (which is the city with the largest Ethiopian community in US). In 1997, after more than 15 years abroad, Aster came-back to Ethiopia and she was warmly welcomed by thousands of her loyal followers awaiting for her at Addis Ababa airport.[3] By the age of 13, Aster was determined to become a musician, and began her career at Hager Fikir Theatre in Addis Ababa. Starting in her late teens, she was performing in clubs and hotels in the capital with bands such as the Continental Band, Hotel D'Afrique Band, Shebele Band and Ibx Band, before they became the internationally known as Roha Band. Aster's distinct style has been influenced by other Ethiopian singers, such as Bizunesh Bekele. Launching a solo career, she was encouraged by musical entrepreneur Ali Tango, who financed and released five cassettes and two singles of her music. By 1981, Aster had become disillusioned by Ethiopia's oppressive political climate following the death of Haile Selassie, and relocated to the United States. Temporarily settling in the Bay Area of California, with plans to pursue higher education within a period of two years, she settled in Washington, D.C., where one of the largest Ethiopian expat communities in the country existed. There, she became increasingly popular within the Ethiopian community, performing in restaurants and clubs. Aster also remains popular in Ethiopia. In 1997, she performed in Addis Ababa for a crowd of over 50,000 people. In 2003, Aster also performed a two-part concert series to raise funds for relief and school initiatives in Ethiopia. The first concert was held in November on Eid Al-Fitr day at the Addis Ababa Stadium, with an audience of 40,000 in attendance. The second performance was a gala-dinner at the Sheraton Hotel.[4] On May 9, 2009, Aster performed in front of a crowd of 10,000 spectators during the Peace Through Unity, Unity Through Music concert held in the capital's Millennium Hall, alongside other Ethiopian music artists. Aster's album Chewa was released on July 24, 2019.[5][6] Aster Aweke joined the business sector by opening a cafeteria called Kabu, which was named after her popular song "Kabu". During the month-long tour that followed, Aweke performed before more than 80,000 people and showed that she remains one of Ethiopia's best-loved performers. Aweke has been equally successful throughout the world. Her second album, Kabu, spent four weeks in the top position on the CMJ New Music Charts, and was in the Top Ten of Billboard's World Music Charts for ten weeks in 1990. A native of Gandor, a small town near Lake Tara, Aweke was raised in the capital city of Addis Ababa. The daughter of senior civil servant in the Imperial government, Aweke was determined to become a musician by the age of 13. By her late teens, she was singing in Addis Ababa clubs and hotels with such bands as the Continental Band, Hotel D'Afrique Band, Shebele Band, and the Ibx Band (before they became the internationally known Roha Band). Launching a solo career, Aweke was encouraged by musical entrepreneur Ali Tango, who financed and released five cassettes and two singles of her music. By 1981, Aweke had become disillusioned by Ethiopia's oppressive political climate and relocated to the United States. Temporarily settling in the Bay Area of California with plans to pursue an education; within two years, Aweke continued on to Washington, D.C., the site of the largest Ethiopian population in the U.S. After building a following with her performances in local Ethiopian restaurants, Aweke toured the U.S. and Europe in 1985. – Craig Harris The renowned Ethiopian singer Aster Aweke announced yesterday that her new album ‘Chewa’ would be released on July 3, 2019. “ Aster’s fans around the world waited for around six years to hear this news. Her last album Ewedihalehu (I love you) which was produced by one of the most known composers Abegazu Kibrework Shlota, was released in 2013. “I was wondering when the next one will be, thank you for this great news. Can’t wait to buy the album.” one fan commented. Aster Aweke was born around 1959 in northern Ethiopia Gondar and raised in the capital Addis Ababa where she began singing in bars and clubs. Launching a solo career, she was encouraged by musical entrepreneur Ali Tango, who financed and released five cassettes and two singles of her music. Like many Ethiopian artists, Aster fled her country’s civil war and Mengistu’s military regime that censored music and relocated to Washington DC, where one of the largest Ethiopian expat communities in the USA existed. There, she became increasingly popular within the Ethiopian community, performing in restaurants and clubs. Aster managed to become popular in her homeland as well. In 1997, she performed in Addis Ababa for a crowd of over 50,000 people. In 2003, Aster also performed a two-part concert series to raise funds for relief, and school initiatives in Ethiopia and a total of more than 50,000 attended on both concerts. Her works even inspired artists like The Weeknd who adopted some of her works in his songs (The Hills) Her distinct style has been influenced by other Ethiopian singers, such as Bizunesh Bekele. Many compare Aster Aweke’s charisma and vocal to legends such as Ella Fitzgerald and Aretha Franklin.
